70 zones for contemporary art in Rotterdam

Rotterdam is not the first city that comes to mind when considering contemporary art. We have been in so many other European cities—inhabiting other local art scenes—that we almost forgot about our own city. We were curious to know how many spaces, platforms or aesthetic zones for contemporary art are currently active. Be it a physical space with white walls or black holes, virtual on the web, or both, an artist's project open to the public, a short term or temporary event or presentation, public readings and film screenings, a magazine, a small publishing house, profit or non-profit, artist and/or curator-run, a 'normal' gallery, or an art institute. What they all have in common is that they actively take part in the art scene presenting, supporting and promoting CONTEMPORARY ART.

I have come to the stunning conclusion that Rotterdam has (at least) 70 spaces/platforms/aesthetic zones for contemporary art, of which 14 are new to me. If you compare this to the art capital Berlin, which has roughly 1 art space per 2 square kilometres, our ratio is 1 to 3. So our city is not the cultural desert I imagined. For a small city (± 600,000 people and 200 km²) this is not bad. Or is it? (continue reading>>)

It is remarkable that the artists' initiatives are not white cubes per se, where art objects are exhibited on white walls. Most show an interest in establishing meeting zones for exchange and learning, discursive and performative spaces, the experimental black box, magazines for critical thought and (visual) research, web-based platforms, communal interactions, collaborative office spaces and the street. The institutes and galleries, however, stick to the traditional white cube presentation.
Rotterdam Art Map #1 offers a snapshot of art zones and gives information on Rotterdam's vibrant and dynamic art scene.
